Money Habitudes

Tips to Talk About Money

Money is one of the hardest things to talk about – but Money Habitudes makes it fun and easy. Here are some other tips to help you have a successful conversation:

- First, acknowledge that talking about money can feel awkward. But it's important.
- Give yourself the advantage of being relaxed. Research shows money talks go better in comfy chairs than when you're cramped. Planning to chat over a nice meal is also a good idea.
- 3 Don't discuss money if you're HALT: Hungry/Angry/Lonely/Tired.
- If you know where you're coming from, it's easier to listen, be open and understand your own tendencies, attitudes, and biases. Money Habitudes provides you with this self assessment.
- Work up to doing a budget or going over credit reports. Start with less threatening conversations that get you comfortable talking about money. Money Habitudes helps with this.
- When you do the activity with someone, present MoneyHabitudes as the fun activity it is. Remember, it's best if both people have their own deck to sort and interpret at the same time.
- Know that where people disagree over money is also where they often counterbalance each other in a good way: think about someone who never spends money paired with someone who finds it easy to spend. If you're about to call someone "cheap," realize you may find it way easier to part with money.

Each of the statement cards can generate good discussions. But here are some other conversation starters:

- Remember the first time you bought something with your own money? What was it? How did you get the money?
- What was your first job? What did you do with your money?
- How did you get money as a child and a teen?
 - What did you learn from your culture or religion about money?
 - Growing up, how was money talked about in your home? Who paid the bills? How were big money decisions made?
 - When you were a kid, did you think you were richer or poorer than your friends or relatives?
